I can find it

I can't find itunes and app store in settings. I can't find it either. I can't find itunes on my mac. I can't find it meme. I can't find it in spanish. I can't find it meaning. I can find it the rainy day. I can't find it either or neither.

What is the difference between "I find interesting" and "I found it interesting"? If I noticed it, and I still think it's interesting. What should I use in the daily conversation? Also, if I lost my key, and later I know where it is, should I say that I find it, or should I say that I found it? Both questions / examples are present with respect to the past. For example, I find it interesting means that at the moment you find something interesting. I found it interesting means that, in the past, you found something interesting. Also applies with the key example. Thank you for your answer. However, my question is if the feeling "I find interesting" describes a state rather than an action. If I say: "I found it interesting," implies that "I think it was interesting sometimes, but now I don't think so". If I say: "I find the key", I have to get the key before you say, so why don't we use the past? If I say: "I found it interesting," implies that "I think it was interesting sometimes, but now I don't think so". It could and may not. The context could help. If I say: "I find the key", I have to get the key before you say, so why don't we use the past? I find the key is not correct. At the end of the day, I ask someone who had his first day of work in the office: what would you say: "You found the work interesting" or "you find the work interesting"? (Suppose you are coming tomorrow.) "I find interesting" = it's interesting. And "I found interesting" = I was interested at that time. (Now you need context to say if you find it or less interesting now.) There are two contexts here I would like to ask questions using $\text{À } \acute{e} \grave{a}, - \grave{a}$ "Did / you find it interesting", what tense would you use? How would you like to ask Your son his new job after the first day? How to you at the $\acute{a} \text{€}$
